

50 SHADES OF SALO

Salo is a beautiful film; it depicts some of the most unpleasant things you can imagine in a beautiful way. The cinematography is gorgeous, the colours opulent, the sets sumptuous. The experience of watching the film however leaves you feeling grimey. Without realising it, you've become sucked into the greedy, violent world of the ruling elite, as they rape, beat and kill their way through their slaves. What if the essence of the beauty in the film were extracted, and distilled. That is what this palette attempts to do. Rather than acting like a designer's palette where colours are arranged sympathetically, and are carefully thought out according to rules (), this palette takes an average colour of fifty single frames and arranges them chronologically. The colours themselves all feel heavy and opulent - there are no bright reds, or yellows. This isn't desperately surprising; Whilst there are a few brightly lit scenes, the majority of the film takes place inside a lavishly decorated, gloomy country house which acts as a prison. It's a shame that there aren't some brighter colours.
